Universal PicturesBy the end of Jurassic World: Fallen Kingdom, a lot of things have changed and by the sound of it, the world can never be the same again. As Dr Ian Malcolm would say, life will find a way, but it will have to adapt to a whole new dynamic before it can.We already know that there's a follow-up to the movie coming, with Colin Trevorrow back in the director's seat and he has already firmly established that Fallen Kingdom was intended to be the middle of a trilogy. In other words, it will all come to an end in the next film, which promises to be an explosive finale to the new Jurassic World series.The question right now is how that finale will take shape in the couple of years it takes to bring it to life. Will we truly see a closer return to Jurassic Park's spirit? Are we finally done with hybrid dinosaurs? And what of the possible villains of the piece? Even now, it's possible to look at how Fallen Kingdom ends and explore what themes and specific story beats we might see in its follow-up.Inevitably, there are SPOILERS for Jurassic World: Fallen Kingdom from hereon in... Page 2 Universal Pictures First, let's deal with the post-credits scene. At the end of the movie, the surviving dinosaurs end up escaping their captivity at Lockwood's mansion thanks to some serious sillness - including the casual revelation of full human cloning, and are let loose on an unsuspecting America as Ian Malcolm's voiceover talks about how the world has changed now. The credits roll as we see the dinosaurs adjusting to their new environments and definitely not just planning on eating everyone and then after the credits the stinger sees two pterodactyls flying to Las Vegas and landing on the smaller replica of the Eiffel Tower. Presumably, this could be foreshadowing a dinosaur invasion of Las Vegas? Or maybe they just really like blackjack? Page 3 Universal So, saving the dinosaurs from death by poisoning is all well and good, but it's now led to a situation where there are now about 20-30 dinosaurs, including a couple of bona fide apex predators, simply out living free in America. There's a Mosasaur seen swimming with surfers, a raptor heading towards a residential estate, pterodactyls hitting up the strip in Las Vegas. And that's without mentioning the T-Rex and the Allosaur, which will both eat everyone they meet and the armoured vegetarian ones who will still do a lot of damage if spooked by anything they've not encountered. Like, say, 99% of civilized society... So, we're looking at the possibility of a small-scale apocalypse led by these dinosaurs as they try to adjust. It's not like they're going to turn vegan, they're going to hunt and kill and eat and that's going to be yet another bad PR day for InGen. Page 4 Hanna-Barbera Productions The most hilarious thing about the ending is Ian Malcolm's monologue about the shifted dynamic in the world now that the dinosaurs are now no longer in captivity. He mentions the fact that we will now have to come to some sort of new arrangement where we try to find some peace together. A world where man and dinosaur can co-exist. Which definitely sounds like he's suggesting the future after Jurassic World 2 will be The Flintstones... Also, it's ridiculous. If a Mosasaur wants to eat everything in the sea, including anyone that dares to swim in it, she will. If a T-Rex wants to make your neighbourhood her home, you best move out. They're not reasonable creatures. Incidentally, why is Malcolm being asked to speak on that panel? After all of his experiences with dinosaurs, him giving an expert opinion is akin to asking pigs their opinion on bacon sandwiches. Page 5 Universal Well, not for the dinosaurs, anyway. Say what you want about Hammond, but his plan to have all the animals one sex wasn't a bad one, even if it was undone by the fact that some frogs can change sex to suit their environment. That should mean none of the dinos can procreate, assuming the later scientists fixed the loophole (which you'd think they would with Henry Wu still involved). Even if they could, there are only a couple of species that had pairs of dinosaurs, like the pterodactyls, so it's not like there'd be much of it going on anyway. So even though the dinosaurs were saved to go free, they definitely aren't going to be around for generations. And assuming someone takes it up themselves to fight back if they start eating people, the apocalypse might not even come in any kind of long-term way. Page 6 Universal Pictures One of the film's most interesting revelations addresses the question of how the original T-Rex is still alive after more than 25 years when the life span was supposed to be 20-25 years according to science. Stupidly, the film explains it by saying that it's like a caveman being revived now: he will be well-fed and looked after and would probably live four times as long now than he would in his own day. So, basically they're saying that the greatest predator to ever walk the Earth will now live longer because it has had a better diet and more love? Horse excrement! No matter how silly the explanation, but it means the freed dinosaurs aren't just going to die of old age in the next couple of months. Assuming nothing can kill them, they could well be out there for a while. Page 7 Universal Speaking with Total Film (via Bloody Disgusting), Colin Trevorrow said of Jurassic World 3: "I'm looking forward to, in the third film, getting a little back into the Paleontological, wild animal, true dinosaur nature of all of it." He also said that there wouldn't be any more hybrid dinosaurs in the next Jurassic World film. But that can't be true. The film ends with Dr Wu once more fleeing the situation with a big briefcase full of genes, and while the D-Rex bone was destroyed, there's no way Wu hadn't already taken the DNA from it anyway for himself. For Wu to suddenly go back on his life's work would be ridiculous, so it seems that Trevorrow must have been misdirecting in this interview. Either that or he plans on leaving one admittedly unresolved plot point in the sequel? Page 8 Universal The way the film almost casually drops in the fact that Isabel Lockwood is a clone of her dead mother is so badly ignored (aside from when she expresses affinity for the dinosaurs) that you have to think that it's going to come back as a bigger deal in the sequel. After all, there's a whole other set of considerations around human genetics and cloning than there is around dinosaurs and it should attract interest from lots of the wrong sorts of people. Could we see Isabel hounded for what she is and what she represents to science? Could we see a revival of the abandoned idea of splicing human and dno DNA to create super-soldiers? Trevorrow might say no at this stage, but there's no way we aren't going to see more of an insight into Isabel's cloning in the next film. Page 9 UniversalBy the look of it, Jurassic World 3 will see a full-on family established as the hero group, following (well, surpassing) the model offered by The Lost World.It seems we'll see Owen and Claire together as a couple in the third film, as well as them looking after Isabel now that her grandfather has been killed. That should at least bring a different feel to the film from the outset.The finale sees them driving off into the sunset, but there's no way that will be the last we see of them. They're all too heavily invested in the story to walk away at this stage. What did you think of Jurassic World: Fallen Kingdom? Share your reactions below in the comments thread. The Jurassic World saga returns to the big screen this July in the aptly-named Jurassic World Rebirth. Helmed by Gareth Edwards (Godzilla, Rogue One: A Star Wars Story), the seventh installment in the beloved blockbuster franchise was written by veteran Hollywood screenwriter David Koepff, who penned the scripts for the original Jurassic Park and its 1997 sequel, The Lost World.While he hasn't directed an installment since Lost World, industry legend Steven Spielberg does serve as an executive producer alongside Denis L. Stewart and Jim Spencer. Frank Marshall and Patrick Crowley are producers.RELATED: See the Most Terrifying Dinosaurs Yet in Final Jurassic World Rebirth Trailer (WATCH)Head below for your guide on everything to know about Jurassic World Rebirth – from plot details to release date!Everything to know about Jurassic World Rebirth aboutPicking up five years after the events of Jurassic World Dominion (stream it now on Peacock), Rebirth finds much of the escaped dinosaur population dying out due to its inability to adapt to our planet's modern-day climate. The last pocket of prehistoric activity exists on a remote island that once served as InGen's research laboratory for the original Jurassic Park.Left to their own devices for over three decades, the dinosaurs on and around this landmass have grown and mutated out of control, prompting a pharmaceutical company to launch an expedition to collect samples from the largest specimens across land, sea, and air. They claim it's for medical purposes, but who can really tell what these mega-corporations are up to? Naturally, things almost immediately go sideways, with several humans becoming snacks for the local fauna.RELATED: Director Gareth Edwards Calls Jurassic World Rebirth a "Love Letter to Spielberg" To me, it's like a heist movie that meets all the films of Steven Spielberg I loved growing up," Edwards told Vanity Fair. "The three films we were orbiting were Jaws, Indiana Jones, and the awe and wonder of the original Jurassic." Scarlett Johansson (Black Widow) leads Rebirth as Zora Bennett, a mercenary-for-hire tapped to lead the dangerous mission. Academy Award-winner Mahershala Ali (Moonlight) plays Zora's right-hand man, Duncan Kincaid. Jonathan Bailey (Wicked) and Rupert Friend (Asteroid City) tackle the roles of paleontologist Dr. Henry Lomis and Big Pharma rep Martin Krebs, respectively. Philippine Velge (Station Eleven), Bechir Sylvain (BMP), and Ed Skrein (Deadpool) round out Zora and Krebs' crews. Manuel Garcia-Rulfo (The Lincoln Lawyer), Luna Blaise (Manifest), David Iacono (The Summer I Turned Pretty), and Audrina Miranda (Lopez vs. Lopez) add a civilian element to the mix as the Delgados, a family shipwrecked on the island.Watch the official trailer for Jurassic World RebirthPer FilmRatings.com, Jurassic World Rebirth has landed a PG-13 designation "for intense sequences of violence/action, bloody images, some suggestive references, language and a drug reference."
