China is home to 56 ethnic groups, all of whom have played a critical role in the development of the various languages spoken in China. Linguists believe that there are 297 living languages in China today. These languages are geographically defined, and are found in China. Mandarin Chinese is the most popular language in China, with over 955 million speakers out of Chinas total population of 1.21 billion people. Songti () :If one type of font had to be chosen to represent Chinese typography, it would be the songti type. Early songti scripts were in use as far back as the Song Dynasty (960-1279 A.D.), when Chinese woodblock printing was in its golden age. Due to the grain of the wood in the woodblocks, which ran horizontally, horizontal lines were easy to produce and could be made thinner. Vertical lines, which ran counter to the wood grain, were prone to breakage during carving, and thus had to be made thicker. In addition, because the end points of the horizontal lines were easily worn away, flourishes were added to make them thicker, so they lasted longer. This is how songti the Chinese serif characterized by perfectly straight horizontal strokes, wider verticals, and classy but regimented flourishes was born. Heiti () :The other major classification is the heiti, similar to sans-serif. Heiti fonts are a relatively modern invention although they were seen emerging in commercial press around the early 1900s. SimHei was the standard sans-serif to SimSun's serif. Recently, Microsoft Yahei has started to replace SimHei as the preferred standard in web layouts, but there are still a couple of compatibility issues. MS YaHei was introduced in Windows Vista, but the number of machines still running Windows XP in China even in 2020 would blow your mind. So while everyone's pretty tired of looking at SimHei, we haven't quite reached the point where people are willing to give it up completely just yet.
