EN Barnum was nothing more than a street vendor-that drought goods is up to him He bought a black woman for $ 1,000, amount he quickly recovered, showing it as Mammy 161-year-old George Washington. BARNUM's business partner, James Bailey, was born the small Jimmy McGinnis-a transformed pachop In Circus Idealizer, a man who taught exempt quartermasters the mass transportation science of men and railway equipment. Before trains, circuses traveled by horse-drawn wags (and were called "mud spectacles" reasons) and fluvial. If it had not been by PAs and high cells, sisters Al, Alf, Charles, John, and Otto Rungeling could have become Iowa Har manufacturers Ness, as his father. But a morning over Mississippi in 1870, the brothers were wounded from a heavy elephant down a steamboat circus board and became forever after the Ringling Brothers, the owners (along with Barnum and Bailey) Larger Earth Spectacle. For many years, its largest rival was the big Porter Circus, owned by a Wallace Porter, a former union cavalry officer. After Appomattox, Porter took his knowledge hardly conquered eqi, applied to the business of the family, and became, at the age of thirty-eight, the owner of the biggest bum in northern Indiana. As he became a circus man is another history altogether.Each See, Wallace Porter embarked on a train in Lima, Indiana, and headed to the east through Ohio, Pennsylvania and New Jersey for the Strange Earth of a Million of People, New York City. He employed a breeding of lawyers and bankers to oversee the profits of their stables and obediently met with them once a year to discuss markets and dividends. These obligations dispensed, he called a car and disappeared into the crowd of the city, following the real impulse of his journey. Wallace Porter was New York to go into extravagance. During his stay of a week, he almost did not sleep, then the intention was him to satiate in the city. In the morning period, he had a shave and walked along the avenues down the length of Manhattan, which, at the end of 1800, was not an ARDA task. He dealt with his business during lunch, and then he visited tailors the best of men in town and bought new shirts, chesterfield coats, leather boots and chapter us-coconut all of which were sent back to Lima Huge saratoga trunks. Night, he dined at Restaurants, spurred in the pheasam and artichokes. He drowned in French vintage wines. After dinner, he picked up a game or the symphony, and then to the high hours of the night, he wandered the parks alone. In Lima, such such It was a poor carâter brand, an almost impossible fails to hide, and it was why Porter liked the anonymity of the city soon. On the train ride back home, the doorman recorded his expenses and that figure hid in his breast pocket like a guilty child. He felt his father's eyes to him, heard his voice saying, Enta E o what you can pay for it? The money would buy more horses, carriages, a hay má's. To punish himself, Porter lived a Spartan existence the rest of the year, but comes from the E Vera, he was on board the train, like a fish that should spawn. When he returned to Indiana hollow feeling completely and totally satisfied. The trip he took to New York in 1883 was different from the others because it was the year he met Irene, who would become his wife. Your banker, father of Irene, invited him to a July 4 and introduced Porter for your guests as "my new friend, the Indian pioneer." Porter, on the E looked nothing like a settler, but something about the prâprio name, Lima, invoked the exâtico and adventurer. The party was given on a warm night will see the E. Irene's father faced the house in red, white and blue, and instructed the small band he hired to play Sousa Marches from time to time for people in patriótico climate. Irene went downstairs to "Bonnie Annie Laurie" and caught the eye of Porter when he was near the punch bowl of smoking a cigar. He was handsome in a small way with his clothes and carriage passed by a space © cie Elegant e INSTANCE. When he saw Irene, he corrected his cigar in a punch cup and met at the bottom of the stairs. He took the má E her, she smiled, and he realized E Enta which since the war, he felt little inside your corações E o, except the ambição E, hardly a thrill E o. Together they watched the exibição f artifício fires as they mingled in the garden. "Tell me about this city his, Lima." Lee-ma, she said. With a smile, Porter said: "In fact, A © like iml E o." "They sA E o IA grown?" A supposed to be Lee-ma, but me in the E think the city fathers knew that." Porter recited a list of mispronounced midwestern cities named to distant places: see candles, Brazzy sick, Kay-Roh, new oração E o. Irene laughed. "Tell me about a lie." E Enta he described the field: He lived out of town over the city, the river that separated the northern half and southern Lima. He described his monthly trip circuit to check your estábulos, and again, gave her a litany of city names: Kokomo, Lafayette, Monticello, Rensselaer, Valparaíso, Nappanee, Varsávia, Alexandria. Irene repeated them as Alguia © m trying to learn a foreign language. Artifício explosions of fireworks lit the Irene's face, and Porter said: "You must travel to the West at some point and see a bit of the world." It was just something to say, but Irene caused. "What A © farthest west that you already been, Mr. Porter?" "Wallace, please," he said. "Leavenworth, Kansas." It was where his cavalry regiment, the dA © first top Indiana, met. Almost twenty years have passed, but he could still see the ground rolling like an ocean in cá © u blue. He tried to turn on the E remember other images: a barn in Alabama full of stinking, rotten, wailing men. His regiment lost 13 in battle, 161 to disease. "I've never been farther than Buffalo to visit my aunt," Irene said. She gestured with a sweep of his mother the E. "All these people in E do anything wing © m to visit each other and get married with each other. They just go round." Irene sighed. "You A © a lucky man, Wallace." He looked at your feet © s, then to the cá © u colorful, trying to gather his courage to ask sees it again the next day. But Irene said it first. "You will have to come back tomorrow and E tell me more." She put the má E braço in his braço. Already, Irene loved Wallace Porter, or knew she would love. But Also you knew this: when men run the women through crowds, they need to believe they are in the rudder. Women should apply subtle and imperceptible pressure with fingertips. In this way, women take while they seem to be led. This is the From the world.New York Courtships were custom cases, drawn over the years, but Irene would have none of it. When her father protested about how rushed marriage would look, she laughed and said, "What do I care? I go to Indiana." They got married two weeks after the party and embarked on the train to Lima. The return trip has become an improvised wedding excursion with extended stays in the best hotels in Filadélfia, Cleveland, Louisville and Cincinnati. They were touristy, they threw Faro in boat salons, dined until they were without restaurants, then moved to the next city. In Pullman, Irene realized Porter's hand, but rarely took her eyes from the unforgettable landscape in the window. For her, the blue ridge were the Alps, and the Ohio River could very well have been the Nile. As they approached Lima, Porter saw the flat earth full of corn with new eyes. He thought for sure that, on arrival, Irene would find the city and his house (and for extension, he himself) very simple, very rude. How could he tell her the truth? He was a long-standing bachelor who, after late nights passed figures, often slept in his stable lie. Despite the mobile and carpets, his house was nothing more than a farm, simple and simple. Porter delayed his arrival there driving through the city in the still hot crepness of September to show her her stables, the hotel of Robertson, Milinery and the dry products store. They passed some of Lima's best-equipped houses. He was inside them, of course, but the porter existed in the fringe of Lima's best circles, Bachelor aging invited to great Christmas parties, but never lunch, never encouraged to abandon. Certainly, he thought, Irene would change that. At the moment he turned home, the darkness settled in the trees for the grass, and Cicados were singing. Near-windswept farms and peeling by tanned daily pink at night with lamps burning on windows, Irene drowsed happily as he guided the horses Down River Road, which tunneled under the green-black trees forcing the Wimmeraw River. In his new home, Irene inspected the living room and dining room by the light of a kerosene lamp. She looked at the stove of the black cuisine and announced that she is intended well to learn her mistakes. Of the four bedrooms upstairs, two were filled with clothes, furniture and paintings - the new york specio of Porter's New York, much of him still on trunks or wrapped in brown paper. Irene laughed. "The king's treasures," she said. Another porter four used as a study: The tube smoke had run for the walls. She walked into the room simply equipped - just a room, bedside table and a draped bed with a patchwork. Porter was until the window to pull the shadow. In the glass, he watched his new wife undo the gloves and knock down his hair, then remove every piece of clothing: dress, stirring, corset, socks, chemise. Irene welcomed the night: She was preparing to sleep in that humble bed, in that modest house, for a life. In the morning, she would ask her husband to take her to a ride; They would come up until their tired horse, then pick a new one in one of their stables and walk, like Pony Express. At that moment, there was not a single missing thing. But what Porter saw reflected in the tremendous glass was a woman ... wom ...
